I was so intrigued, in fact, that I chose Psychology as one of my majors in College. But something was wrong. No matter how much I learned I still didn't seem to be getting the results I wanted. But I was relatively comfortable so I didn't worry about it too much. Until another girl broke up with me.

You see, I was the kind of guy that would find a girlfriend and then hold on to her however I could (usually through manipulation and guilt – yeah I know, very unhealthy) because I was afraid that if we broke up I wouldn't be able to find another one. For me, being in a relationship was comfortable, it was safe and I yet deep down I knew I wasn't completely happy. I relied on the woman I was dating for my identity and my happiness. Now back to the story.

So there I was working as a bartender in New Zealand after graduation when my girlfriend of 2 years decided to come out and live with me. She quit her Flight Attendant job, flew out and after two months living together she broke up with me. I was devastated. This is the most alone I had ever felt in my entire life. Heartbroken, alone and completely unhappy in a foreign country was the last straw. I was going to master social skills if it killed me!

And it did... I am actually a ghost. j/k I spent the next five years searching out guys who had charisma, who made friends easily and instantly, who girls fawned over, the kind of guy we all wish we could be. It became my personal mission to learn every last thing I could from them. And you know what was odd? They all did different "things", sometimes contradictory things. And yet it all worked... for them. But a curious thing began to happen to me as I spent more and more time with them. I started to get the same results. It wasn't until later that I realized what had happened. Ready for the big secret? I began to subconsciously absorb their beliefs and values.

Beliefs and values are the subconscious "commands" that direct our actions, filter the way we view the world and determine how we interpret events, including social interactions. All of the "techniques" that these guys were teaching me, even the ones that contradicted each other, worked because they were in line with each particular guy's beliefs and values. Now I finally understood why no matter how much I learned, I still wasn't getting the results I wanted! My subconscious beliefs and values were out of line and holding me back!
